Executive Summary

a) Objectives

The main aim of the project “Religion in Education. A Contribution to Dialogue or a Factor of Conflict in transforming societies of European countries?” (REDCo) is to establish and compare the potentials and limitations of religion in the educational fields of selected European countries and regions in order to identify approaches that can contribute to making religion in education a factor promoting dialogue in the context of European development.

Our project aims at analysing conceptual and practical approaches to mutual understanding in the field of religious education. We are analysing how theoretical and practical approaches in schools and universities that encourage openness towards others and mutual respect across religious and cultural differences can be strengthened, without excluding existing tensions between people of different religion, culture and political opinion. Projecting into the future, we cannot hope to solve this task at the national level alone. A European perspective needs to be established by means of comparative studies. This is the stated aim and corresponds to the outcome structure of our project.

Theoretical, conceptual and empirical analysis will help to lay the foundation for our understanding of the contribution religion in education can make towards the current transformation processes in various European countries. By comparing different approaches we hope to gain the necessary historical perception and analytical clarity to address the core questions of dialogue and conflict in Europe and to find ways to stimulate a process of growing European identity/ies.

b) Contractors

Nine research partners are involved as contractors:

- University of Hamburg (coordinator) in Germany. Coordinating person: Prof. Dr. Wolfram Weisse. Project leaders at the University of Hamburg: Prof. Dr. Thorsten Knauth and Prof. Dr. Wolfram Weisse.
- University of Warwick in England. Project leader: Prof. Dr. Robert Jackson.
- Ecole Pratique des Hautes Etudes, Sorbonne, Paris in France. Project leader: Prof. Dr. Jean-Paul Willaime.
- VU University Amsterdam in The Netherlands. Project leaders: Prof. Dr. Siebren Miedema, Dr. Ina ter Avest, deputy: Prof. Dr. Cok Bakker, University of Utrecht.
- University of Stavanger in Norway. Project leader: Prof. Dr. Geir Skeie.
- University of Tartu in Estonia. Project leader: Dr. Pille Valk.
- University of Muenster in Germany. Project leaders: Prof. Dr. Muhammad Kalisch and Dr. Dan-Paul Jozsa.
- Russian Christian Academy for Humanities, St. Petersburg in Russia. Project leaders: Prof. Dr. Vladimir Fedorov, Prof. Dr. Fedor Kosyrev.
- University of Granada in Spain. Project leaders: Dr. Aurora Alvarez Veinguer and Prof. Dr. Gunther Dietz.

c) Work performed

First project year:

1. Analytical work with regard to the role of religion in education in Europe on the basis of documents and the development of a database: All partners wrote analyses on their respective countries focusing on the role of religion in education. The reports include information on the developments in recent decades, the special contexts, debates on religion and education and new challenges in the countries taking part in REDCo and in Europe as a whole. This basic study underpins our ongoing research on the role of religion and education in Europe. Our ongoing work was also supported by a database including literature and different types of documents related to our REDCo-theme. This database will be publicly available and will constitute a valuable research tool for others working in the field of religion and education in Europe in the future.
2. Preparation of the fieldwork and the start of the empirical work in all countries: Our empirical work was discussed in detail. As a result we wrote a fieldwork guide in which our common approaches and methods of data were recorded, and another report including decisions on the detailed research design for our field work. This guaranteed a common basis for our empirical research. Additionally we began the fieldwork using different methods including participant observation, interviews and video-filming in school classes. One major piece of qualitative research was done by use of a written questionnaire, which was completed by at least 70 pupils in the age-group of 14-16 years in each participating country. On the basis of the data provided, preliminary reports for each REDCo-country and comparative analyses of the results were drafted. These were revised and completed within the next half year and have also been used to inform our quantitative research, which was structured and organised within the six months following.
3. Establishing a theoretical basis: During the first year, theoretical issues were raised mainly in seminars, and this preparatory work was followed up more thoroughly during the second year. The debate about the interpretive approach as a common theoretical framework showed that there was a need to further develop the balance between the descriptive and the prescriptive aspects of the approach. More input from the different projects on their use of the approach was needed in year two. Discussions of 'non-foundational education theory', 'neighbour-religions', 'citizenship education' and 'identity-formation' have been included in the participants' deliberations.

Second project year:

4. Field-work: In the second year of REDCo we deepened our fieldwork applying an appropriate set of methods. Our focus was on research using qualitative and quantitative methods and on video-analyses of school lessons. Research using qualitative methods was conducted in all participant countries with a jointly developed qualitative questionnaire. The aim of this research was to gain insight into the personal views of pupils on and their experiences with religion, into the social dimension of religion in their lives, and into religious education in school. The data we collected proved to be of such importance that we decided to publish them in book form (see paragraph d) of the executive summary). On the basis of our qualitative analyses we developed a quantitative questionnaire in English which has been translated into all REDCo-languages. Our survey started in January 2008 and was completed in March 2008. In all countries we achieved a minimum of 400 completed questionnaires from pupils in the age group of 14-16 years. In most of the countries we collected 1000 or more questionnaires in order to create a sounder basis for our analysis. The data analysis was undertaken from April 2008 onwards. Other lines of field work were also continued and deepened in the second year of our research. These focused mainly on classroom interaction and the role of teachers. Both areas of research were concluded in the third year of REDCo. We published our findings as a book and articles in refereed journals.

5. Theoretical approaches: During the second year, we continued our research on theoretical issues. The debate about the interpretive approach as a common theoretical framework was completed thoroughly and productively. In successive discussions by the REDCo project team, a number of factors became clear: The interpretive approach was a theoretical ‘stimulus’ (as indicated in the project proposal), but did not provide the theoretical framework for the project as a whole. The key concepts of the interpretive approach were used in field research in both methods and data analysis as well as in pedagogy. The project included scholars and researchers versed in a range of epistemological and theoretical positions and methodological approaches. This was regarded by the project team as very healthy, and permitted a constructive dialogue on issues of epistemology, theory and method. Other concepts were also addressed. The concept of ‘neighbour religions’ was used by participants to focus on local religious diversity and on neighbourhood interaction. The relationship between different forms of religious education and education for democratic citizenship as well as the question of plural identities of young people remained on-going issues under discussion by the project team.
6. Information and Discussion Forums: We extended our dissemination activities considerably. A series of discussion and information forums for schools, teachers, pupils and parents were organised in all of our countries. The numbers and intensity of the participation of REDCo-members in conferences and public meetings dealing with religion in education increased considerably: We presented our project on 147 occasions in Europe, Asia, North America, Central America and Australia with a total outreach of about 40.000 participants. The number of articles published by members of our consortium – about 100 – was also high and showed both the energy to publish on our theme and the readiness of publishing institutions to accept our articles. Plans were also being worked out to produce three films on REDCo which can be used for public events and for seminars at schools and universities.

Third project year:

7. Analyses based on field work: We gained a plethora of results from our empirical data working with both qualitative and quantitative approaches.
Qualitative approaches: At the beginning of the third year of REDCo, we published a comprehensive qualitative survey on the views of teenagers with regard to religious pluralism in school and society (Knauth et al. 2008). Throughout the third year we continued our qualitative research work with regard to classroom interaction and the role of teachers in heterogeneous classes. Both avenues of research resulted in publications. The first issue is covered in: ter Avest et al. (2009), Dialogue and Conflict on Religion; the second is dealt with in: Alvarez Veinguer et al. (2009), Islam in Education in European countries (see paragraph e).
Quantitative approaches: The aim of this survey was to gain insight into the personal views of pupils on and their experiences with religion, into the social dimension of religion in their lives, and into religious education in school using quantitative methods. The data we collected proved to be of such importance that we decided to publish them in book form.

Our questions for the quantitative questionnaire were developed on the basis of our qualitative results. Throughout all REDCo-countries we deployed a total of more than 8.000 questionnaires, so that we were able to create a solid basis for our research. The results show that in all our countries, acceptance of religious heterogeneity is the mainstream position among youngsters in the 14-16-year age group. Nonetheless, the school has a central role to play in learning about and from religions. This is necessary, as many of the pupils have wrong information or prejudices about other religions. Nevertheless our findings are clear: Irrespective of their national and religious identity, pupils in Europe are open for a dialogue with different religious and cultural positions. We published our results in: Valk et al. (2009), Teenagers' Perspectives on the Role of Religion in their Lives, Schools and Societies (see paragraph e).

8. Theoretical approaches in triangulation with empirical findings: We applied the following theoretical approaches intensively: The approaches of “neighbour-religions”, “citizenship-education”, “non-foundational education”, “identity-formation” and the “interpretive approach”. Regarding “neighbour-religions”, a development away from studying foreign religions at a spatial and temporal distance and towards a concentration on the cultural and religious plurality in the home region or country was outlined. The commonly held opinion now is that it is vital for children from different world religions not to become 'alien' to each other, with all the stereotyping and divisions that entails, but rather to be seen as fellow humans and neighbours. The issue of Citizenship Education was also given considerable attention during the project. One of the reasons for this is, of course, that the diversity of political and societal systems had to be taken into account in terms of contextualising a particular country, but also to be viewed from a comparative perspective. The explicit support of all REDCo researchers for non-dogmatic, open and dynamic theoretical approaches towards addressing world views and religion in an educational context is clearly expressed in our research. Non-foundational education stresses the value of personal expression and dialogue for personal religious identity-formation and emphasises a concern for the otherness of the other as a core element of every form of religious education. This is especially the case with regard to the concept of religious identity formation. Using the latest insights from developmental education and developmental psychology, the religious identity-development of youngsters in the 15-17 year age group is theoretically conceptualised in the very apt terms of exploration and commitment (identity-formation). The debate about the interpretive approach as a common theoretical framework has been continued thoroughly and productively. The key concepts of the interpretive approach were used in field research, in method development and in data analysis as well as pedagogy.

9. Dissemination: In addition to more than a hundred academic articles and even more presentations at conferences worldwide, we used three exceptionally creative instruments and organised two especially high-level public events.

Our special instruments of dissemination work were three films produced on our REDCo-work. One provides a condensed impression of the overall work, one is focused on classroom interaction in Europe, and the last one presents a case-study from one of our members of the consortium. As elements for exhibitions, we also produced 14 roll-up-displays based on our research results. Last but not least, we formulated “policy recommendations”, which show the main results of our research and requirements of European and international organisations as well as educational institutions at a European as well as a national level.

We also had the opportunity to organise two high-level public events: One took place on 3

December 2008 at the European Parliament in Brussels. Commissioner Jan Figel gave an introduction, Member of the European Parliament Vural Oeger welcomed the REDCo-researchers, and we from REDCo had the opportunity to present our findings. More than 120 people attended that gathering. The other event took place on 19 March 2009 at the Council of Europe in Strasbourg. The Director-General Gabriella Battaini-Dragoni introduced the theme with a very positive acknowledgement of REDCo, and we once more had the chance to present our findings.

d) Overall Research Results

Our project has carried out joint research in eight European countries simultaneously for the first time. Until the end of our project in March 2009 we successfully carried out research in the following fields:

- addressing the increasingly urgent question how dialogue between cultures and religions can be fostered and gaps bridged in the context of religion in education, including identifying effective pedagogical approaches and ways of dealing with religious conflict in educational settings.
- formulating a view of the possibilities and limits of interreligious dialogue at the conceptual and empirical levels, with particular (though not exclusive) reference to the 14-16 age range.
- combining national studies with very different profiles with agreed theoretical, methodical and thematic approaches from the outset.
- including research and development partners in schools and maintaining dialogue with and providing information for stakeholders in our education systems, including various religious groups, the general public, the media and politicians.

e) Publications

Our work shows the value of exploring our theme in joint analytical publications. All in all six books were published on the main results, exclusively by REDCo members.

- Jackson, R., Miedema, S., Weisse, W., Willaime, J.-P. (Eds.) (2007) Religion and Education in Europe: Developments, Contexts and Debates, Muenster: Waxmann.

- Want, A. van der, Bakker, C., Avest, I. ter, Everington, J. (Eds.) (2009), Teachers Responding to Religious Diversity in Europe, Münster: Waxmann.

During the third project year we recorded an even higher research and dissemination output than within the first two years of the REDCo project. We wrote 26 reports, 21 of them deliverables, 5 of them milestones. In addition to the five books with the project results in whose production all partners were involved, several more were published of special analyses written by members of REDCo with reference to our research. In terms of dissemination we continued our presentations in almost all parts of the world, produced three films on REDCo, one exhibition, and wrote more than one hundred articles in journals and books.

f) Project logo, website, flyers and photos

Since the outset we have been using a special logo for the REDCo project (reproduced below).

We have also developed a website for REDCo. The address is: <http://www.redco.uni-hamburg.de/>. In addition to the internet, we developed an intranet facility to promote easy communication between the researchers of REDCo. We have produced flyers in order to communicate the basic ideas of REDCo and to provide information about the consortium and contact addresses. These flyers are available in printed format and via our website in the following languages: Spanish, French, English, Dutch, German, Norwegian, Russian, and Estonian. Besides, photographs are available on our website.

g) Policy recommendations

All of our research results are focused in our Policy Recommendations, which were thoroughly discussed within the last months of our REDCo project and in a final intensive discussion and decision in our plenary meeting at Klingenthal (near Strasbourg) on 19 March 2009.

I. Introduction

Throughout the world, people are increasingly coming to recognise the implications of the renewed importance religion holds for both individuals and societies in national and international politics and public discourse. Growing religious diversity has given the question new urgency, and accordingly 'social cohesion' is a frequently cited policy goal when addressing the role of religion in European societies. This is especially evident in the attention paid to the study of religions as a part of intercultural learning and human rights education and is clearly expressed in international documents such as the Council of Europe's White Paper on Intercultural Dialogue (Council of Europe 2008) and the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe's Toledo Guiding Principles on Teaching about Religions and Beliefs in Public Schools (OSCE 2007). Both documents stress the importance of dialogue between people of different faiths and convictions in the context of intercultural teaching and learning. This is also the focus of REDCo (Religion in Education. A Contribution to Dialogue or a Factor of Conflict in Transforming Societies of European Countries), a European comparative research project on young people's views of religion, religious diversity and possibilities for dialogue, as well as of classroom interaction and teacher strategies. REDCo is the first substantial research project on religion and education financed by the European Commission, running from 1 March 2006 until 31 March 2009. It has carried out qualitative and quantitative research in eight countries (Germany, England, France, The Netherlands, Norway, Estonia, Russia, Spain) mainly focusing on religion in the lives and schooling of students in the 14–16 age group. The students expressed their attitudes about personal experience with religion, the social dimension of religion, and religion in school. The REDCo findings can encourage further policy development in education at a European as well as at a national level.

II. Key research findings of REDCo

- The majority of students appreciated the religious heterogeneity in their societies, although a range of prejudices were expressed.
- The most important source of information about religions and worldviews is generally the family, followed by the school.
- The school population includes a sizeable group of students for whom religion is important in their lives, a sizeable group for whom religion is not important and a sizeable group who hold a variety of occasionally fluctuating positions between these two poles.

- Irrespective of their religious positions a majority of students are interested in learning about religions in school.
- Students are well aware of and experience religious diversity mostly in, but also outside school.
- Students are generally open towards peers of different religious backgrounds. At the same time they tend to socialise with peers from the same background as themselves, even when they live in areas characterised by religious diversity.
- Students often express a tolerant attitude more at an abstract than a practical level. The tolerance expressed in classroom discussion is not always replicated in their daily life-world.
- Those who learn about religious diversity in school are more willing to enter into conversations about religions and worldviews with students from other backgrounds than those who do not have this opportunity for learning.
- Students desire peaceful coexistence across religious differences, and believe that this is possible.
- Students believe that the main preconditions for peaceful coexistence between people of different religions are knowledge about each other's religions and worldviews, shared interests, and joint activities.
- In most countries students support the right of adherents to a moderate expression of religious faith in school. For example, they do not oppose in school the wearing of unobtrusive religious symbols or object to voluntary acts of worship for students who are adherents of a particular religion.
- Students for whom religion is important in their lives are more likely to respect the religious background of others and value the role of religion in the world.
- Most students would like to see school dedicated more to teaching about different religions than to guiding them towards a particular religious belief or worldview.
- Students express their desire that learning about religions should take place in a safe classroom environment governed by agreed procedures for expression and discussion.
- Students generally wish to avoid conflict on religious issues, and some of the religiously committed students feel especially vulnerable.
- Dialogue is a favoured strategy for teachers to cope with diversity in the classroom, but students are more ambivalent about its value since in practice, not all students are comfortable with the way diversity is managed in schools.
- Students generally favour the model of education about religion with which they are familiar.

III. Policy Recommendations

On the basis of the findings of REDCo we support the policy recommendations of the Council of Europe and the Toledo Guiding Principles. However, we suggest a need for a degree of differentiation at the national level regarding the implementation of policies in the educational system. This is due, for example, to different national traditions, norms, legal systems and pedagogical approaches in dealing with religion in education. Each national context needs to be taken into account when policies are applied. At a European level we suggest making room in the classroom for dialogue and discussion about and between different religious (and non-religious) worldviews. Against the background of our research on the views of students we underline the importance of dialogue at classroom level which emphasizes the exchange of different perspectives of students, concerning religions and worldviews.

Proceeding from this general assumption, the following points should be taken into account both when addressing different national contexts and the European level.

1.) Encouragement for peaceful coexistence

Education policy development and implementation need to focus on the transformation of abstract (passive) tolerance into practical (active) tolerance.

Actions:

- Counter stereotypical images of religions, present more complex images that show the impact of religion on society and the individual.
- Develop and strengthen skills for dialogue between pupils concerning different religions and worldviews
- Provide opportunities for engagement with different worldviews and religions, (including cooperation with local communities in order to increase exchange between different religious and non-religious groups) and to offer opportunities for encounters between students of diverse positions vis à vis religion.

2.) Promotion of diversity management

Citizenship education tends to focus on homogeneity; but in turning from passive to active tolerance, it is necessary to value religious diversity at school as well as at university level.

Actions:

- Offer opportunities for students to learn about and give space for discussions on religions.
- Develop innovative approaches to learning about religions and worldviews in different subjects including RE, history, literature and science.
- RE and learning about religion must incorporate education for understanding and tolerance and take account of children's differing needs as they develop.
- Encourage universities to give fuller consideration to religious diversity in research and teaching.

3.) Including religious as well as non-religious worldviews

School is a place where all students must be respected, regardless of their worldview or religious conviction. Religion is important to some of the students, and their beliefs must not be allowed to become an obstacle to their academic progress.

Actions:

- Inclusion of learning about different religious and secular worldviews in their complexity and inner diversity.
- Inclusion of the religious dimension into general intercultural education, education for democratic citizenship and human rights education.

4.) Professional competence

No changes can be made without education professionals and the required competence on their part. Such education would be needed both at initial training level and in the continuing professional development of teachers

Actions:

- Prepare educators in different subjects to treat religious topics relevant to their subject, ensuring the inclusion of students regardless of their religious or non-religious background.
- Train educators in methods that support and encourage students to be comfortable with difference and to engage with the diversity of their personal experiences.
- The curriculum for teacher training should include the development of skills to organise and moderate in-class debates on controversial religious issues and conflicting worldviews.

Section 1: Project objectives and major achievements

Objectives

The project's main aim was to establish and compare the potentials and limitations of religion in the educational systems of selected European countries and regions. Approaches and constellations that can contribute to making religion in education a factor promoting dialogue in the context of European development have been addressed.

Looking at religion in the context of education, we analysed the position and importance of religions and religious values in various European countries with their very different traditions. Our main aim was to look at the challenges facing religious education in the context of current changes in European societies and their importance for dialogue and mutual understanding without disregarding potential problems. We believe it is vital in this context not only to further develop theoretical approaches, but also to look for possibilities for successful dialogue in actual, daily situations of encounter occurring at schools throughout the Union. Taking account of potentials for confrontation as well as dialogue, this will allow us to develop impulses for the future peaceful coexistence of people of different religions and beliefs.

In the context of historical development, we concentrated on questions of religions and religious values. Differences were not studied in the abstract or through history (there are numerous studies of this kind from both theological and religious studies perspectives), but in their impact on modern Europe and the lives of its citizens. We did research empirically on the question of how differences within European societies can be addressed and thematised without creating conflict or exclusion. Empirical studies, targeting students in the 14-16-year age group, looked into their own perceptions of dialogue or conflict within the different national contexts. These included a dual perspective of, on the one hand, the subjects' own perspectives and, on the other hand, analyses of observed teaching in both dialogue and conflict situations. Our subject selection also allowed for gender-specific results. It is particularly from those studies that we gained further insight into whether and how religious and value-based identity development can coexist or must clash with openness to other positions.

Our project analysed conceptual and practical approaches to mutual understanding in the field of religious education. The correlation between low levels of religious education and a willingness to use religion as a criterion of exclusion and confrontation has been pointed out before. We, conversely, looked into how, in the context of religious education in schools and universities, theoretical and practical approaches that further openness towards others and mutual respect across religious and cultural differences can be strengthened. Looking towards the future, we cannot hope to complete this task at the national level alone. A European perspective needed to be established through comparative study. This was the stated aim from the beginning and is reflected in the outcome structure of our project.

Theoretical, conceptual and empirical analyses helped to lay the foundation for our understanding of the contribution religion in education can make towards the transformation processes at work in various European countries. By comparing different approaches we gained the necessary perception of historical depth and analytical clarity to address the core questions of dialogue and conflict in Europe and to find ways to stimulate a process of growing European identity/ies.

Main achievements

First project year:

Within the first year of our research we answered the following questions:

- What is the historical background of religion in education in the participating countries? Does this history show more potential for conflict or opportunities for dialogue?
- Which legal and institutional frameworks for religion in education currently exist in the different countries and regions?
- What approaches used in participating countries show potential for a perspective in the development of European identities?

Our analyses are published in:

Jackson, R., Miedema, S., Weisse, W., Willlaime, J.-P. (Eds.) (2007) Religion and Education in Europe. Developments, Contexts and Debates (Muenster, Waxmann).

Additionally, a database has been produced. In cooperation with the Comenius Institute in Münster/Germany, we will transfer the database into a permanent format which will be made accessible to other projects/researchers.

Our main achievements were:

1. Profound analyses of the historical background of religion in education in the participating countries, the potential for conflict or opportunities for dialogue, of the current legal and institutional frameworks for religion in education in the different countries and regions, and of approaches used in participating countries, also focussing on the potential for a perspective in the development of European identities (see publication above).
2. Proceeding from the empirical work we produced 11 reports with analyses of a qualitative written questionnaire (see above): The same questions were answered by pupils in all of our countries. Fieldwork in schools and communities started in the second half of the first year. We discussed topics and approaches in detail in a plenary meeting in Granada in May 2006 and reported on our field work in our plenary meetings in Tartu in September 2006, and in Melilla in February 2007. Initial difficulties to get access to schools in Granada were successfully resolved. In all other countries the field work was possible without any major hindrances.
3. During the first year, theoretical issues were raised mainly in seminars, and this preparatory work was followed up more thoroughly during the second year. The debate about the interpretive approach as a common theoretical framework showed that there was a need to further develop the balance between the descriptive and the prescriptive aspects of our approach. More input from the different projects on their use of the approach was provided in year two. A discussion of 'non-foundational education theory', 'neighbour-religions', 'citizenship education' and 'identity-formation' was included in the participants' deliberations.

Second project year:

In the course of the second year of our research we answered the following questions:

- Which conceptual approaches to religion in education can be further developed as a basis for a form of religious education in schools and universities that aims at dialogue and understanding without excluding difference?

- Which empirical findings at the national and European level point toward those elements of religious education that further dialogue and understanding without excluding existing tensions between people of different religion, culture and political opinion?
- How can these theoretical and empirical findings be combined in order to provide strong and sustained impulses throughout Europe?

Our analyses are presented in the publication:

Knauth, T., Jozsa, D.-P., Bertram-Troost, G. & Ipgrave, J. (Eds.) (2008), Encountering Religious Pluralism in School and Society – A Qualitative Study of Teenage Perspectives in Europe (Muenster, Waxmann).

Our main achievements were:

1. In-depth analyses of the views of teenagers on religion, religiosity, dialogue and conflict between religions, and forms of inclusion of religion in education (see publication above).
2. In addition, progress was made concerning the quantitative survey. Carefully thought-out steps in the preparation guaranteed a solid basis for the quantitative questionnaire:

- theoretical preparation of the quantitative survey
- developing a system of research questions and hypotheses, and a set of variables and indicators
- design of the instrument for the survey: development of the quantitative questionnaire as a follow-up of the qualitative questionnaire; development of the procedure for the comparative survey: design of a three-step procedure for creating the survey (pre-pre-test, pre-test and main survey); development of a set of guidelines (including translation issues) and documentation.

All these steps aimed to create conditions for a reliable comparative quantitative survey among pupils to collect valid data and to develop the preconditions to guarantee a high level of quality for the data analyses. The survey from January to March 2008, which included at least 4000 completed questionnaires across our REDCo-countries, formed a solid and productive basis for our analysis in year three.

3. In terms of field work, we made considerable progress in two other domains: classroom interaction, analysed on the basis of videotaped school lessons, and the role of the teacher in the classroom. For the discussion of methodological approaches and concrete interpretations we organised three workshops in different countries of our consortium in order to combine national and international analyses. The teacher as a key player for both learning processes and classroom interaction was a central focus of our research and from this perspective we analysed patterns of dialogical and/or patterns of hierarchical learning processes.
4. Last but not least we intensively continued our debates on theory. The interpretive approach as a common theoretical framework was discussed thoroughly and productively. In successive discussions by the REDCo project team, a number of factors became clear: The interpretive approach should be seen exactly as portrayed in the project proposal. It was a theoretical ‘stimulus’, but did not provide the theoretical framework for the project as a whole. The key concepts of the interpretive approach were used both in field research in relation to methods and data analysis and in pedagogy. The approach provided a framework and stimulus for the discussion of issues in both of these contexts. Our project includes scholars and researchers versed in a range of epistemological and theoretical positions and methodological approaches. This was regarded by the project team as very healthy, and permitted a constructive dialogue on issues of epistemology, theory and method. The importance of the key concepts of the interpretive approach lay not in their ability to impose any uniformity in theory, epistemology or method, but to assist in the identification and clarification of issues in theory, methodology and pedagogy. Other concepts were also included: The concept of ‘neighbour religions’ was embraced by participants to focus on local religious diversity and neighbourhood interaction. The relationship between different forms of religious education and education for democratic citizenship and the question of plural identities of young people were regularly discussed by the project team.

Third project year:

In the course of the third year of our research, we answered the following questions:

- How can the findings be formulated in a manner that allows them to be adopted and utilised by institutions at the national and European level?
- What can the findings add to the development of our goals for a peaceful coexistence of people from different cultural, religious and political backgrounds in Europe?
- What growth potential for elements of a European identity do the findings hold?

Our analyses have been published in the following publications:

- Avest, I. ter, Jozsa, D.-P., Knauth, Th., Rosón, J. & Skeie, G. (Eds.) (2009), Dialogue and Conflict on Religion. Studies of classroom interaction in European countries, Muenster: Waxmann.
- Alvarez Veinguer, A., Dietz, G., Jozsa, D.P., & Knauth, Th. (Eds.) (2009), Islam in Education in European countries - Pedagogical Concepts and Empirical Findings, Muenster: Waxmann.
- Valk, P., Bertram-Troost, G., Friederici, M. & Béraud, C. (Eds.) (2009), Teenagers' perspectives on the Role of Religion in their Lives, Schools and Societies. A European Quantitative Study, Muenster: Waxmann.
- Want, A. van der, Bakker, C., Avest, I. Ter, Everington, J. (Eds.) (2009), Teachers responding to Religious Diversity in Europe. Researching Biography and Pedagogy, Muenster: Waxmann.

Our activities for dissemination (as already described in the Executive Summary) were the following: In addition to more than a hundred academic articles and even more presentations at conferences worldwide, we used three exceptionally creative instruments and were able to organise two especially high-level public events.

The special instruments of our dissemination work were:

- Three films were produced on our REDCo-work. One gives a condensed impression of the overall work, one is focused on classroom interaction in Europe, and the last presents a case study from one of the members of our consortium.
- Exhibitions: We produced 14 roll-up displays based on our research results for use in exhibitions.
- Policy Recommendations: Last but not least, we formulated “policy recommendations” which show the main results of our research and the requirements of European and international organisations as well as educational institutions at a European as well as a national level.

We organised two high-level public events:

- European Parliament: The event took place on 3 December 2008 at the European Parliament in Brussels. Commissioner Jan Figel gave an introduction, Member of the European Parliament Vural Oeger welcomed the REDCo-researchers, and we from REDCo had the opportunity to present our findings there. More than 120 people attended that event.
- Council of Europe: The other event took place on 19 March 2009 at the Council of Europe in Strasbourg. Director-General Gabriella Battaini-Dragoni introduced the subject with a very positive acknowledgement of REDCo, and we had the chance to present our findings.

Section 2: Workpackage progress

This section contains information on all workpackages. We include: Involved partners with lead contractor, status of the work package, objectives, progress towards objectives with deviations from the original plan (if this is the case) and deliverables.

Workpackage 1: Planning and Contextualisation

Involved partners: All members of the consortium.

Lead contractor: University of Hamburg

Status: Completed

Objectives:

- To establish a solid background for the participating countries on historical and societal key-developments on the contribution of religion in education in European countries and regions,
- to work out a background on the development of ideas and actions within the Council of Europe's history
- to fix an agreement on the structure of cooperation for the field-work.

Progress towards objectives and deviations from the original plan:

We completed our work within the first half year of the project. There has been no deviation from the original plan.

Deliverables:

All deliverables (D1.1, D1.2, D1.3, and D1.4) have been completed on time.

Milestones:

All milestones (M1, M2) have been completed on time.

Workpackage 2: Theories and Methods

Involved partners: All members of the consortium.

Lead contractor: University of Warwick (Deputy: University of Stavanger)

Status: completed

Objectives:

- to use, to check, to adapt, to correct, and to develop the interpretive approach
- to use impulses of “neighbour-religion”, citizenship-education, non-foundational education, and identity-formation and to develop them further
- to use methods and to adapt and to develop them for our purposes

Progress towards objectives and deviations from the original plan

First project year:

This workpackage focused on theories and methods applied throughout the entire project. A variety of qualitative and quantitative methods were used within the overall project, with all studies being informed by key concepts related to the interpretive approach.

A crucial task during the first year was to discuss and clarify the different methodological approaches used in the individual studies and to find a common understanding of these. Some studies used ethnographic fieldwork methods extensively, others mainly relied on quantitative methods. One used action research and in other cases a mixture of several methods was applied. Methodological issues were also discussed as part of all the main seminars (Hamburg, Granada, Melilla), and texts circulated in order to facilitate this discussion. We were able to clarify the following:

- The design of qualitative questionnaires (used in all participating countries)
- The development of quantitative questionnaires (used during the second year of the project)
- The development of a common understanding of the main elements of ethnographic fieldwork, and the development of fieldwork guides
- Possibilities and limitations of the use of video as a method of classroom interaction analysis in different national and local settings
- The development of methods of video analysis in smaller seminars with participation of those project members who are able to use this method actively
- The possibility of developing a publication dealing with the project's methodological issues is currently being considered.

During the first year, theoretical issues were raised mainly in seminars, and this preparatory work was followed up more thoroughly during the second year. The debate about the interpretive approach as a common theoretical framework showed that there was a need to further develop the balance between the descriptive and the prescriptive aspects of the approach. It became clear that more input from the different projects on their use of the approach was needed in year two. A discussion of 'non-foundational education theory' was included in the participants' deliberations.

Participants initiated an important and promising debate on the main concepts in the project title, 'dialogue' and 'conflict', and this was subsequently developed both in terms of conceptual and theoretical aspects, with an emphasis on how these concepts may be operationalised in the different studies. There was also an increasing focus on the issue of 'identity-formation', including a consideration of gender perspectives.

Second and third project year:

Groups of questions, each set corresponding to one of the three key concepts of the interpretive approach (representation, interpretation and reflexivity), were developed and used as a research tool by participants in relation both to research and pedagogy (see M2.1 report). These checklists were then used by participants in relation to the qualitative and quantitative surveys, video analysis and teacher interviews, and also by the Warwick community of practice. For example, issues of the representation of religion(s) were addressed in the design of both the qualitative and quantitative questionnaires used with 14-16 year olds in all participating countries, and in the analysis of qualitative data. In the analysis of the data of the qualitative questionnaire the difference in representation of the concept of religion, and of religious concepts such as 'God' and 'prayer', use was made of techniques of gendered discourse analysis.

In the quantitative research, the checklist of questions based on the key concepts of the interpretive approach was found to be a helpful tool to ensure that survey questions reflected religious traditions in their variety and left space for pupils' interpretations, and that issues of 'translation' and interpretation were addressed. The concept of 'interpretation' drew attention to the issue of the use of related but different concepts (and the translation of terminology expressing those concepts) in different cultural settings, which need to be compared and contrasted in order to promote understanding. The issue of interpretation arose in relation to the development of both the qualitative and quantitative questionnaires. All participating groups wrote semantic analyses of the term 'religion' (and equivalent terms) in their languages. This material assisted the interpretation of data from the quantitative study, and especially facilitated the comparison between different representations of 'religion' in the 8 countries, reflecting the diversity of usages.

The issue of reflexivity was taken into account in the development of the qualitative research. For example, one researcher first 'interviewed' herself on the topics that constitute the interview, to raise awareness of her own presuppositions and ideas. These responses of the researcher interviewing herself were compared and contrasted with the responses of those being interviewed. This method was shared with other researchers. With regard to gender issues, reflexivity on the gender of the researcher in relation to the gender of the respondent raised questions on the 'social desirability' of the answers of the respondents: 'social desirability' in relation to the establishment of a relationship between researcher and respondent. For example for some young male Muslim respondents it seemed very embarrassing to be interviewed by a female researcher. Reflexivity has also been a key element in the research of the Warwick community of practice.

Representation and reflexivity both are key concepts in the 'teacher project' and the 'classroom interaction' project. In the process of analysing biographical interviews with teachers there was a focus on the representation of religion in relation to the biography of the teacher. In the analysis of the video taped RE lessons on classroom interaction researchers found striking examples of the concurrence of verbal and non-verbal communication, as well as verbal and non-verbal communication being different in character for male and female teachers. There is also a difference in the way boys and girls participate in RE lessons. Reflexivity of the researchers is stimulated by cultural differences in the participating countries as well.

The concept of 'neighbour religions' was used by participants to focus on local religious diversity and on neighbourhood interactions.

The relationship between different forms of religious education and education for democratic citizenship, and the question of plural identities of young people were on-going issues under discussion by the project team. Data from the qualitative and quantitative surveys especially informed the discussion about these issues and subsequent writing on these themes.

As a main outcome the book based on the work of the Community of Practice, which develops ideas from the interpretive approach through a series of related action research studies, went to press in April 2009:

Iprgrave, J., Jackson, R. & O'Grady, K. (Eds.) (forthcoming 2009), Religious Education Research through a Community of Practice: Action Research and the Interpretive Approach, Muenster: Waxmann.

Deliverables:

All Deliverables (D2.1, D2.2, D2.3, and D2.4) have been completed on time.

Milestones:

All Milestones (M2.1, M2.2) have been completed on time.

Workpackage 3: Empirical research

Involved partners: All members of the consortium.

Lead contractor: VU University Amsterdam (Deputy: University of Granada)

Status: completed

Objectives:

Objectives of this workpackage are:

- to gain better knowledge on the question what pupils think about the function of religion in society, what experiences they have with religious education and how they see possibilities of RE at school (contributing to dialogue and/or conflict?)
- to understand better the dynamics of classroom interactions and factors contributing to dialogue and/or conflict,
- to know better the background of teachers and their resources, to use diversity as an opportunity or not.

Progress towards objectives and deviations from the original plan

First project year:

The preparations for empirical research started three months after the kick-off meeting in Hamburg, that is at the second meeting of the complete REDCo team in Granada, Spain, from 25-29 May 2006. At that meeting the development of a qualitative questionnaire was begun, a questionnaire to be used by the ten participating research groups. After tackling several important conceptual problems in a small subgroup with the aim of making the questionnaire usable in the different research contexts, the instrument could be finalized and tested in a pilot study by all the groups. After some small changes the final instrument was used by the end of 2006. In the end of 2006 a “Structuring Guide” was composed to be used while writing the report. Around February 4 each group sent their regional report to Hamburg. A first, preliminary comparative analysis was done and the results were presented during the meeting held from 22-25 February 2007 in Melilla, Spain .

At the Melilla meeting the preparations for the collective quantitative study also commenced. Preliminary hypotheses for this study were formed on the basis of the qualitative research outcomes.

In general, the empirical research in the REDCo-project was conducted fully in line with the planning. The cooperation between the different research teams and within each research team was excellent. With the qualitative and quantitative comparative research carried out in the project, REDCo could make a unique contribution to the understanding of religion in education in Europe.

Finally, both during the Granada and Melilla meetings the different research teams reported back and co-ordinated their local empirical projects. Although locally rather different in their thematic emphasis as well as their methodologies, these local projects all focused on dialogue vs. conflict in RE from nationally and regionally complementary perspectives.

Second project year:

The empirical research in this period consisted of both a qualitative part and a quantitative part. Above (and in Periodic Activity Report 1) the first steps of both research parts were described. By that time, data collection with regard to the qualitative research was already finalized and a preliminary comparative analysis was done. In March 2007 decisions were taken about the publication of the results of the qualitative questionnaire. It was decided to prepare a book on the qualitative analyses. The steering committee concluded that Thorsten Knauth, Dan Paul Josza and Gerdien Bertram-Troost were to be the editors of this volume. At a later stage Julia Ipgrave entered the board of editors as well, due to her research expertise and as a native English speaker.

In March 2007 Guidelines for the revision of the regional reports were developed. Within half a year, the preliminary analyses were completed and converted into articles. The regional reports formed the basis for the so-called bi-contextual analyses. The goal here was to compare data from countries that show certain contextual similarities. On the basis of the regional articles and the bi-contextual analyses a European comparison was written by the editors of the book for the final chapter. What is compared in this chapter is not data on the student populations of European countries in the abstract, but data generated by students from different religions, cultural, family and individual background from settings that differ not only by country, but also by region and environment. Nonetheless, the European comparison clearly shows tendencies and gives us a glimpse on the diverse European perspectives on religion, religious pluralism and religion in education. The work of researchers and editors resulted in the following publication: Knauth, T., Josza, D.-P., Bertram-Troost, G. D. & Ipgrave, J. (Eds.) (2008), Encountering Religious Pluralism in School and Society. A Qualitative Study of Teenage Perspectives in Europe, Muenster: Waxmann).

In March 2007 a working group which was to be responsible for the quantitative questionnaire was formed (including members from the Estonian, Dutch, French and German REDCo-teams). The first and principal task of this working group was to formulate a questionnaire on REDCo's main research themes which could be distributed among youngsters aged 14-16 in the participating countries (minimum amount: 400 questionnaires per country.) In April 2007 this working group met in Hamburg to discuss the variables and categories which should be central in the questionnaire. A first version of the questionnaire was presented, serving as a starting point for discussion. The main research questions were formulated as follows:

1. What role can religion in education play concerning the issues of dialogue and conflict (view of the pupils)?

The sub-questions were:

- 1.1. What role does religion play in pupils' life?
- 1.2. How do pupils see religion in school?
- 1.3 How do they see the impact of religion in Education?

In the following period the working group maintained intensive contact via Skype and e-mail in order to prepare both the questionnaire and the field guide. As a result, the research questions were slightly reformulated. Alongside, research hypotheses were formulated, as tools for data analysis. The main research questions and hypotheses were discussed in the overall group at the St. Petersburg meeting. Finally, the main research question was formulated as follows:

What role can religion in education play concerning the way pupils perceive religious diversity?

The sub-questions were:

- 1.1 What role does religion have in pupils' life and in their surrounding (important others, peers, family)?
- 1.2. How do pupils see religion in school and the impact of religion in education?
- 1.3. How do pupils consider the impact of religions: do they contribute more to dialogue or more to conflict?

1.4. Which are the differences between the countries participating in the REDCo project, concerning the main research question?

A pre-pre test was conducted in May and June 2007. In each of the countries represented by the members of the working group at least five pupils filled in the questionnaire and gave their oral reaction. On the basis of the results of this pre-pre test, which was described in pre-pre test reports, further discussions via Skype and e-mail were held. Where needed, the questionnaire was changed on the basis of the pre-pre test. After a period of intensive discussions a next version of the questionnaire became available. This version was distributed among all the REDCo-members and was discussed during a group session in St. Petersburg in September 2007. One of the important issues for discussion was the issue of translation. A field guide for translation was created. In an international project, it is very important to be aware of contextual differences and connotations. The decision was made to use the “ask-the-same-question-model”, which means that translations need not be literal if a literal translation might prove less adequate to express the meaning of a certain question. During the discussions in St. Petersburg it became clear that a very important, and complicated, translation issue was the question how to translate ‘religion’. In order to get more information on how pupils use and understand this term, an open question was added to the pre-test version of the questionnaire. The answers of the pupils on this question gave a clear insight on which formulation should be chosen in the respective countries as a translation of the concept ‘religion’. Researchers were asked to reflect on the reactions of the pupils and to give their suggestions for the translation of the concept ‘religion’. All the documents on this issue were collected and used in further publications on the genesis and justification of the quantitative questionnaire.

In October/November 2007 the pre-test was conducted (at least with 50 pupils in each of the participating countries). A SPSS-data file was created so that the researchers could insert their data for comparison. This preliminary comparison, together with the reports on the pre-test, served as starting point for the discussions on the final questionnaire. Discussions on the final version of the questionnaire took place, again via Skype and e-mail, between the second half of November 2007 and the first half of January 2008. One of the main issues was how to shorten the questionnaire as it immediately turned out that the pre-test version was much too long. Along with this, the order of the questions was changed and some questions were reformulated to allow pupils to better understand the questions. Apart from the discussions on the questionnaire, an important task of the working group was to make decisions on the research sample. After all, the necessary documents and explanations on the quantitative research could be distributed to all the REDCo-researchers on 21 January 2008.

In general, the results of our qualitative research ended up in an excellent book publication which exceeds earlier expectations of this part of the REDCo research. On the other hand, it took more time to prepare the quantitative questionnaire than was expected beforehand. In-depth conceptual and method-technical deliberations and decisions were needed in order to guarantee fully valid and reliable outcomes.

Last but not least, during the St. Petersburg meeting (September 2007) the different research teams also reported on their local empirical projects and/or international sub-projects (like the project on the role of the teacher).

Third project year:

After all necessary documents and explanations on the quantitative research were distributed to all REDCo-researchers on 21 January 2008, all results were to be sent to the coordinator of the working group, that is Professor Pille Valk, Tartu University in Estonia, in electronic format by the end of March 2008. Although the main survey was finalised slightly later than initially planned, the REDCo research group was fully convinced that only an adequate and comprehensively tested questionnaire could guarantee fully valid and reliable outcomes. Thus, more time was needed in order to prepare the quantitative questionnaire than was expected beforehand. Specifically, in-depth conceptual and methodological deliberations and decisions were needed. With the final questionnaire in good shape, outcomes could confidently be expected to contribute valuable and useful insights into “religion in education” in Europe. This expectation was entirely fulfilled.

The next steps were the data analysis and the publication of the results. During the REDCo meeting in Amsterdam (6-10 March 2008) and a follow-up in Stavanger (29 May - 2 June 2008), the final decision was taken to publish them in book form, as had been done with the outcomes of the qualitative survey. The intention was to release that book in spring 2009, so that it would be available at the final meeting of the REDCo team in Klingenthal, France from 16-20 March 2009. That goal was met as the full manuscript reached the publisher (Waxmann) in time.

The empirical research carried out in the sub-projects such as the project on the role of the teacher and the project on classroom interaction was also finalized in early Spring 2008. Here, too, the decision was made to publish two books on the basis of the research results with Waxmann. These books were also available at the final meeting of the REDCo team in Klingenthal.

The REDCo team also agreed to publish articles based on the research done in peer-reviewed international journals during and after the 3-year project period. Some articles have already been published, some have been accepted for publication and others are being submitted or in preparation.

Deliverables:

All deliverables (D3.1, D3.2, D3.3, D3.4, D3.5) have been completed on time.

Milestones:

All Milestones (M3.1, M3.2) have been completed on time.

Workpackage 4: Data Analysis

Involved partners: All members of the consortium.

Lead contractor: University of Tartu (Deputy: VU University Amsterdam)

Status: Completed

Objectives:

Objectives of this workpackage are:

- to work out a solid data basis for field work in Europe
- to set up valid structures for the comparative analysis of data from field work in Europe
- to set a standard for the triangulation of theory and empirical research data.

Progress towards objectives and deviations from the original plan

First project year:

Following the structuring of the empirical research (see Workpackage 3) an important step of analyzing the qualitative data was the structuring of the data analysis. This process resulted in the development of the “Structuring Guide” by the end of 2006. This guide not only provided the format for the regional qualitative research reports, but also proved the crucial tool for the data analysis of the regionally collected data. On the basis of the data analysis by each regional research group that was sent to Hamburg around 4 February 2007 in the form of a report of approximately 50 pages, a first preliminary comparative analysis was carried out. The outcomes of that comparative analysis were presented in Melilla, Spain during the REDCo meeting from 22-25 February 2007. Further sophisticated follow-up analyses followed based on improved single regional reports, and resulted in the final research findings as well as in a final report on the qualitative research by the end of October 2007. Alongside the overall comparative analyses, bilateral analyses - that is region to region comparisons - were delivered by the end of September 2007. In general, the process of the data analysis in respect to the qualitative research undertaken by then went extremely well.

Preparation for the quantitative survey began in May 2006 in the seminar held in Granada (25-29 May 2006). Using brainstorming in the workgroups, the first outlines for the questionnaire design were chalked out. The scale of religious prejudice developed in the Estonian context was also introduced. The first round of the survey about religious prejudice among the students of Humanities in the University of Tartu was carried out in September 2006. The design for the data analysis of the quantitative research started during the period up to the summer of 2007. Networking with the researchers from the department of sociology from the University of Tartu and from the University of Hamburg contributed to the high standards of quantitative data analyses.

Second project year:

To continue the preparatory work for the REDCo quantitative research the above-mentioned special working group carried out the following tasks:

- theoretical preparation of the quantitative survey: developing a system of research questions and hypotheses, and set of variables and indicators;
- design of the instrument for the survey: working out of the quantitative questionnaire as follow-up of the qualitative questionnaire.
- working out the procedure for the comparative survey: developing a three-step procedure for the survey (pre-pre-test, pre-test and main survey), and developing a set of guidelines and documentation set.

All these steps aimed at creating conditions for a reliable comparative quantitative survey among pupils, to collect valid data and to develop preconditions to guarantee a high level of quality for the data analyses. Thus the following main efforts to improve the process can be listed:

- Analyses of the data and feedback reports about the pre-pre-test of the instrument, meant to examine the comprehensibility of the questions, and the time pupils need to fill in the questionnaire. A pre-pre-test was conducted in late May and early June 2007. On the basis of the outcomes, decisions were made in respect to the layout, the length and the formulations of the items used in the instrument.
- The pre-test was conducted in October and November 2007. In the process of preparation of the pre-test the working group of the quantitative study had to solve several problems. First of all it became clear that the translation of the instrument into the different languages was quite challenging. To ensure that the collected data would be comparable in the analyses an additional exploration of the terms and expressions used in the questionnaire was needed. Thus researchers from different countries were asked to send clarifying notes on the usage of particular terms in their languages. Also respondents of the pre-test were asked to write down in their own words how they interpreted the word “religion”. This material was analysed by the national teams and could also be helpful at the time of data analyses of the main survey.

- Pre-test data from approximately 50-60 respondents from 7 countries were sent to Tartu University where the pre-test data analysis was conducted using an SPSS program. The results of the analyses, which circulated among the members of the working group, were helpful tools to finalise the work on the instrument for the main survey.
- Pre-test reports and the lists of questions raised in the process of data insertion were taken into consideration when finalising the procedure for the main survey. This was to ensure the quality of the main survey data collation.
- To ensure the possible highest quality of data collected during the survey, the working group for quantitative research worked out a sampling guide, a translation guide for the instrument, a field guide for fieldwork, forms for feedback and reports, and a basic file for data analyses. The research process itself was also documented.

In the process of designing the quantitative research, the working group faced several challenges. This was due to the different traditions and “schools” of quantitative research, the very different contexts in which the survey was to be conducted, and several logistical problems with organising such an extensive comparative study. That caused the initial time schedule to become very strenuous.

Alongside the main quantitative survey, some local projects also continued their data analysis (such as a project in Estonia on religious prejudices among students of humanities).

Third project year:

Data collection fieldwork for the main quantitative study began in January 2008 and ended by the end of March 2008. Thereafter the analysis of the extensive data set began at the University of Tartu, Estonia, under the leadership of Professor Pille Valk and her colleagues. The working group functioned as a support or reference group for decisions to be made in respect to data analysis in terms of methods and procedures. Alongside this extensive central data analysis, some analysis was undertaken by the national groups separately using other sources of input as well.

Although the working group faced several challenges related to the requirements of data analysis during the process of designing the quantitative survey due to the encounter of different traditions and “schools” of quantitative research, the very different contexts where the survey was conducted and a number of technical problems in organising such a comprehensive comparative study, the REDCo team nevertheless managed to complete these tasks in the period between the end of March and the meeting in September 2008 in France.

The very substantial book on the REDCo quantitative research project that was available at the final meeting of the REDCo team in Klingenthal, France from 16-20 March 2009 bears impressive testimony to the successful completion of the process of data analysis.

Concerning data-analysis in local projects as was mentioned above it can be stated that most of the local projects also continued and finalised their data-analysis in the period between the end of March and early September 2008 (such as the mentioned project in Estonia).

Deliverables:

All deliverables (D4.1, D4.2, and D4.3) have been completed on time.

Milestones:

All milestones (M4.1, M4.2) have been completed on time.

Workpackage 5: Comparison and Perspectives

Involved partners: All members of the consortium.

Lead contractor: Ecole Pratique des Hautes Etudes/Sorbonne (Deputy: University of Hamburg)

Status: completed

Objectives:

Aims of this workpackage are:

- to compare current concepts for the inclusion of religious education in the context of schools in Europe
- to further and to develop approaches for religious education with the potential to enable and to encourage interreligious dialogue
- to develop better concepts for Universities for teacher-training that reflects and takes up religious and cultural pluralism.

Progress towards objectives and deviations from the original planFirst project year:

We started to lay the foundations of this workpackage through the following research activities:

- Discussions on concepts for the inclusion of religious education in the context of schools in different European countries,
- Workshop (Hamburg University, November 2006) on challenges facing universities in order to open up a perspective on demands for research and teaching that serves interreligious and dialogical teacher-training at universities,
- Discussion on the gender issue at our plenary conference in Melilla, February 2007.

Second project year:

We further developed the foundations of this workpackage through the following research activities:

- Our qualitative empirical data of the views of teenagers on religious pluralism in school and society in our REDCo-countries were analysed at three levels: contextual analysis (every single country), binational analyses, European comparison (cf. Knauth, Jozsa, Bertram-Troost & Ipgrave 2008).
- We composed a quantitative questionnaire for the same age group. After a pre-pre-test in month 16 and a pre-test in month 20, we finalised the design of the main questionnaire in month 22. The questionnaire was distributed in schools in all our countries. Thorough discussion on thematic and language issues ensured that we received a solid and unique basis for bi-national and European comparisons which were worked out in the third year of REDCo.

- We focused our discussions on approaches adequate for the inclusion of religion in education in a comparative manner. This ensured the development of a solid and future-oriented basis for a policy paper for “Religion and Education” at a European level. This was our task in the third year.
- We continued to address the challenges facing universities in order to open up perspectives on demands for research and teaching that serves interreligious and dialogical teacher-training.
- We continued our discussions on the gender issue and its relevance for religion and education.

Third project year:

At the beginning of the research process we intended to test the qualitative findings on the views of the 14-16 years old students in our different countries by using quantitative counter-checks: “On the basis of the results of the qualitative analysis, questions will be worked out for a quantitative questionnaire. This will be answered by 200 pupils in each country” (Weisse, 2007, 19). With a total of 8075 pupils surveyed it is apparent that this plan had to be expanded considerably. We surveyed a sample of high explanatory significance, according to the composition of pupils in each country. The publication of the findings is one of the few comparative surveys to address more than half a dozen European countries. It is the only quantitative study focussing on such vital issues as dialogue and conflict between religions as perceived by the students themselves. Additionally, these qualitative and quantitative surveys of pupils were supported by further comparative empirical studies of the REDCo project such as e.g. the sub-project on teachers and another study on classroom interaction. In the teacher sub-project a total of thirty-six teachers, i.e. six teachers in six participating countries, were interviewed in-depth about their perception of diversity and their pedagogical strategies to respond to diversity. Some of the national reports also draw on findings from the classroom interaction project that focused on both teachers and students and applied different qualitative research methods.

Qualitative and quantitative methods were combined in an effort to balance the breadth versus depth trade-off and to acquire knowledge of pupils’ attitudes toward religious education in both depth and breadth. This procedure also ensured that the research was very closely aligned with the young people's everyday lives and that in turn the results allowed drawing conclusions in terms of educational issues.

Current concepts to include religion in European schools: The conclusion of our research was that religion in education was an important issue in all of the countries participating in the REDCo project. However, the historical backgrounds, especially the particular configuration of the relationship of state and church and school and church, and the current contexts of religion in education in these countries greatly differed. We also concluded that our shared common ground at that moment was found in a strong convergence with respect to the aims of religion in education. With an eye to the growing religious plurality in each country and in Europe in toto, teaching about religions and worldviews was seen as a necessary condition for an adequate conceptualization of religious education. We further observed that pedagogically speaking and from the aim of the religious identity formation in terms of knowledge, experience and action, in many of the participating countries this was interpreted as a necessary but not sufficient condition.

University training: Even though teacher training at university level was not the focus of the research activities in the REDCo project, the findings stimulated reflection about interreligious education at university among the REDCo professionals who again carried discussions forward in their home countries. For example, the participation of the Russian Christian Academy for Humanities (RChA) in the REDCo project raised interest in inter-religious education among professionals. As a direct result of this, the teacher-training program “Religious Studies” was developed on the basis of the St. Petersburg Academy of Postgraduate Pedagogical Education.

Gender: The focus of the REDCo research is on the students. In this contribution we focus on the comparison of boys and girls as separate groups. Although in recent debates on education, gender issues are usually articulated with respect to the so called ‘feminisation of education’, it is mainly the gender of the teacher that is focused upon. However, when it comes to the role of religion in education, any thematisation of gender is uncommon. When it comes to the gender of the students (a visible and decisive aspect of their identity development), it is even less usual that gender is seen as an important variable in the role of religion in education.

This work has enabled us to write Policy Recommendations of the REDCo Research project entitled “Religion in Education: Contribution to Dialogue”. We also drew some conclusions in order to open up perspectives on the demands made of universities for research and teaching that serves interreligious and dialogical teacher-training.

Deliverables:

All Deliverables (D5.1, D5.2, and D5.3) have been completed on time.

Milestones:

All Milestones (M5.1) have been completed on time.

Section 3: Project management (Workpackage 7)

Involved partners and Lead contractor: University of Hamburg

Status: completed

Objectives:

- to work out and to maintain a productive structure of cooperation,
- to secure the realisation of the planned deliverables
- to manage the finances of the project
- to help in the organisation of the plenary meetings
- to manage problems within the consortium and to help finding solutions

Progress towards objectives and deviations from the original plan

First project year:

The overall organisation, communication and financial questions were solved with considerable input of time and energy, but without any substantial difficulties. In addition to members of the consortium, who had from the very beginning more than one project-leader, the following REDCo-members asked the steering committee to install the following co-project-leaders. University of Hamburg: Dr. Thorsten Knauth, University of Muenster: Dan-Paul Jozsa, University of Granada: Dr. Aurora Alvarez Veinguer. The steering committee of REDCo voted unanimously in favour, seeing a strengthening of the consortium in the three co-projectleaders. Our kick-off meeting in Hamburg (March 2006) proved to be highly effective. All questions arising could be resolved in a concentrated and productive atmosphere. We had a most effective start of the project and after half a year we completed the first five deliverables. We had plenary meetings with steering-committee sessions in Granada (May 2006), in Tartu (September 2006) and Melilla (February 2007). All those sessions have been most constructive for evaluating our progress and designing next steps of our research.

Cooperation started with other EU-Projects, e.g. with VEIL (Values, Equality and Differences in Liberal Democracies. Debates about Female Muslim Headscarves in Europe) and EMILIE (A European Approach to Multicultural Citizenship: Legal, Political and Educational Challenges). Additional cooperation with other research projects such as 'Muslims in Europe and Their Societies of Origin in Asia and Africa' funded by the German Federal Ministry of Education and Research has been set up.

Second project year:

A plenary meeting with steering-committee sessions took place in St. Petersburg (September 2007). This session and additional contacts by phone and email have been most constructive for evaluating our progress and designing the next steps of our research.

Within the second year there was only one major problem, which could be solved without any disadvantages for the proceeding of the project. This problem concerned the necessary termination of the participation of the Deutsches Orient-Institut. In a meeting of our steering committee on 13 September 2007 in St. Petersburg with representatives of all members, the REDCo-consortium unanimously took the decision to ask the European Commission to terminate the participation of the "Deutsches Orient-Institut (German Institute for Middle Eastern Studies) and to reallocate the tasks and the financial resources of the Deutsches Orient Institute to the University of Hamburg. The coordinator informed the authorities of the EC immediately after this decision had been taken. As a result, an amendment was directed to the research officer of the EC asking for the termination of the Deutsches Orient-Institut to become effective on 1 March 2007. A request to extend the duration of the REDCo-project by a month was added to this amendment, so that the end date was now 31 May 2009 (instead of 28 February 2009). The EC reacted positively to both parts of the amendment.

Cooperation continued with other EU-Projects, e.g. with VEIL and EMILIE (see above). Two members of our consortium had a meeting with the coordinator of EMILIE in October 2007 in Athens, where an exchange of material took place and plans for further contacts were established.

As the number of deliverables and milestones for our REDCo-project grew, we established a reminding system, starting 5 months before the deliverable/milestone became due. Our experience with this system was very positive.

Third project year:

Plenary meetings with steering-committee sessions took place in The Netherlands (March 2008), Stavanger (May 2008), Paris (September 2008), Warwick (November 2008) and Klingenthal (March 2009). Again, these sessions and additional informal contacts were most constructive for the progress of the project.

Résumé: The REDCo-project altogether ran extremely well and the only major problem that occurred was solved in a positive manner and without any changes to or negative impact on the research process and the dissemination strategies of REDCo. Regarding the work package plan and status bar chart there were no deviations from our plans, laid down in Annex I – “Description of Work” of the REDCo-contract, pages 46-48.

Deliverables:

All deliverables (D7.1, D7.2) have been completed.

Milestones:

All milestones (M7.1, M7.2, M7.3, M7.4, M7.5, and M7.6) have been completed.

Section 4: Other issues

No other issues needed special attention at this stage of the project.

Ethical issues

We observed all rules of ethical conduct in our field-work, especially concerning the protection of the pupils involved in interviews, photos and videotaping/filming.

Gender issues

Throughout the approach and structure of our research project, gender issues are addressed. This also applies to our theoretical work as well as to our empirical studies, where gender issues are relevant from the very beginning (planning phase) to the interpretation of our results and our comparative analyses.

Policy issues

Our project takes up challenges outlined by the Council of Europe and helps to spread awareness and knowledge through its dissemination activities which also emphasise the societal implications and organisational demands (especially with regard to religion and education in schools and universities). We succeeded in raising awareness of our research results through public events at the European Parliament in Brussels (3 December 2008) and at the Council of Europe (19 March 2009). On the basis of our research we formulated and distributed policy recommendations with the title “Religion in Education: Contribution to Dialogue” (published in eight languages on our website: <http://www.redco.uni-hamburg.de>).

Annexe – Dissemination

Workpackage 6: Exploitation and Dissemination

Involved partners: All members of the consortium. Lead contractor: University of Hamburg and University of Stavanger

Status: completed

Objectives:

- to use possibilities of dissemination in schools where our field work took place (teachers, pupils, parents and school officials)
- to use possibilities of information and discussion within universities and research institutions
- to use possibilities to inform stakeholders of political and societal institutions
- to use possibilities of information via the media.

Progress towards objectives and deviations from the original plan

First project year:

We started work on the different sectors of this workpackage:

- We constructed a first version of information boards which could be used in information forums at universities and schools etc.
- We developed a concept and produced elements that could be used for a film on religious education in Europe.
- We developed different materials for the media, e.g. flyers in all languages spoken in the different REDCo countries.
- In addition we set up an internet page for REDCo which is visited quite often (www.redco.uni-hamburg.de) by journalists contacting us.

Public REDCo events were organised in the context of our plenary meetings: in Hamburg at the end of March 2006 with 130 participants from the University, the media, schools, and different groups from civil society. In Tartu we had a public REDCo event in September 2006 with about 60 people attending from the university, schools and from other sectors in the town. In Melilla, the Spanish colleagues organised a public REDCo event with 60 people attending, including the Deputy Minister of Education, members of the university and schools, and the media. As a consequence of all these public events articles were published in newspapers and in some cases radio broadcasts made on the topic.

In cooperation with the European network for Religious Education in Europe through Contextual Approaches (ENRECA) we started a new book series with the title ‘Religious Diversity and Education in Europe’. This series is edited by Prof. Dr. Cok Bakker, Prof. Dr. Hans-Günter Heimbrock, Prof. Dr. Robert Jackson, Prof. Dr. Geir Skeie and Prof. Dr. Wolfram Weisse. The first book of REDCo was published:

- Jackson, R., Miedema, S., Weisse, W., Willlaime, J.-P. (Eds.)(2007), Religion and Education in Europe. Developments, Contexts and Debates (Muenster, Waxmann).

We also started a series of articles and academic lectures on REDCo, both nationally as well as internationally (for details see further down in this annex) and could even intensify this activity (e.g. by following invitations to conferences in Europe, Asia and the USA). We set up information forums with colleagues and in schools.

Second project year:

We continued to work in the different sectors of this workpackage:

- We organised information and discussion forums in REDCo countries with the counterparts of other members of our consortium and regular information and discussion forums in schools for teachers, pupils and parents (see D 6.7 and D 6.8).
- We developed information material (information boards, flyers, film material) which was used in information forums at universities and schools.
- We further elaborated concepts for different REDCo-films which can be used for dissemination and study purposes.

Public REDCo events were organised in the context of our plenary meeting in St. Petersburg in September 2007: 150 persons participated in a public event organised by our colleagues from St. Petersburg. Participants came from the media, from schools and from different groups of civil society. As a consequence of these public events by REDCo there were articles published in newspapers and members of our consortium were invited for a 60-minute radio talk on the most popular radio-station in St. Petersburg (about 200.000 listeners). We also had the opportunity to present an extensive series of public lectures, radio- and TV-segments, newspaper articles etc. in our different REDCo-countries (see details below)

In cooperation with the European network for Religious Education in Europe through Contextual Approaches (ENRECA) we continued our new book series with more publications. A second book with results of our research in the second year of REDCo was published:

- Knauth, T, Jozsa, D.-P, Bertram-Troost, G., Ipgrave, J. (Eds) (2008) Interreligious Encounter in School and Society. An empirical study on teenager religiosity in Europe (Muenster, Waxmann).

We intensified the writing of articles and academic lectures on REDCo, both nationally as well as internationally (for details see down in this annex) e.g. by following up invitations to conferences in Europe, Asia and the USA.

Third project year:

We published four further books on the research results of the REDCo project:

- Avest, I. ter, Jozsa, D.-P., Knauth, Th., Rosón, J. & Skeie, G. (Eds.) (2009), Dialogue and Conflict on Religion. Studies of classroom interaction in European countries, Muenster: Waxmann.
- Alvarez Veinguer, A., Dietz, G., Jozsa, D.P., & Knauth, Th. (Eds.) (2009), Islam in Education in European countries - Pedagogical Concepts and Empirical Findings, Waxmann: Muenster.
- Valk, P., Bertram-Troost, G., Friederici, M. & Béraud, C. (Eds.) (2009), Teenagers' perspectives on the Role of Religion in their Lives, Schools and Societies. A European Quantitative Study, Muenster: Waxmann.
- Want, A. van der, Bakker, C., Avest, I. Ter, Everington, J. (Eds.) (2009), Teachers responding to Religious Diversity in Europe. Researching Biography and Pedagogy, Muenster: Waxmann.

In addition to more than a hundred academic articles and an even greater number of presentations at conferences worldwide, we were able to use three exceptionally creative instruments and organised two especially high-level public events. The special instruments of our dissemination work were:

- Three films produced on our REDCo-work. One provides a condensed impression of the overall work, one is focused on classroom interaction in Europe, and the last presents a case study by one of the members of our consortium.

- We produced 14 roll-up-displays based on our research results for use in exhibitions.
- We formulated “policy recommendations”, which show the main results of our research and the requirements of European and international organisations as well as educational institutions at a European as well as a national level.

We organised two high-level public events:

- One took place on 3 December 2008 at the European Parliament in Brussels. Commissioner Jan Figel gave an introduction, Member of the European Parliament Vural Oeger welcomed the REDCo-researchers, and we from REDCo had the opportunity to present our findings. More than 120 people attended that event.
- The other event took place on 19 March 2009 at the Council of Europe in Strasbourg with about 70 people attending. Director-General Gabriella Battaini-Dragoni introduced the subject with a very positive acknowledgement of REDCo, and we had the chance to present our findings.

Deliverables:

All deliverables (D6.1, D6.2, D6.3, D6.4, D6.5, D6.6, D6.7, D6.8, and D6.9) have been completed.

Milestones:

All milestones (M 6.1, M6.2, and M6.3) have been completed.
