Project description

Looking to the past to understand the evolution of economic sovereignty

The legal definition of economic sovereignty has changed over time, and it no longer encompasses as much as it once did. In an effort to understand this change, the EU-funded CaPANES project will investigate six European cities that were bustling networked hubs of economic activity between 1400 and 1620. It will utilise agent and network-based modelling to map changes to economic sovereignty within a city and the links between cities. In turn, this will reveal more about the causal patterns of change, which will subsequently be used to overhaul current notions of economic sovereignty from a legal perspective.
