Project description

Bringing to light active and productive citizen participation

How to develop a culture of participation in the context of a ‘knowledge society’ is a challenging issue faced by contemporary democracies. The EU-funded ISEED project will use the experience of citizen science as a model to rethink how participatory and deliberative practices can be successfully implemented in democratic governance. Its goal is to develop a new conceptual and empirical framework - based on a multidisciplinary area of expertise and skills - aimed at testing the role and value of active citizen participation in institutional decision-making, taking into account open, transparent and shared access to deliberative processes. The project will also contribute to the scientific literature on argument formation and management in the context of the new technologies of communication.
